a persona and outprint address commercialism, capitalism, consumerism, and the transition to the information age. he makes the point that the information age was in fact a transition back to mass culture as wide adoption of the internet had its limits - such as people still going to malls to buy the same products they could get at wal-mart. nevertheless, this collection of articles and books shows that the information age has not only democratized information, but also democratized creative expression. toleration and the domestic screen, by catherine "kitty" kidd (wayne state university press). a droll yet often disarming examination of the meaning and relationships between religion and media in american culture, from the civil war through to the new age. she chronicles the birth and rise of the family (movies and magazines, old and new print, radio, television and the computer), as well as the beginnings of the civil rights movement and the movement for women's rights. she also looks at, what she calls, the "home screen," including the marriages of couples, the frequent absence of fathers from home life, and the rise of the single-parent family. kidd shows how commercial and educational media contribute to "tolerance," showing how entertainment, education, and advertising all enable families to control their own "screen time," while allowing them some freedom to find the right balance of time and money. wonderful wizard of oz: the life and times of l. frank baum, creator of the land of oz, by candace fleming, illustrated by john hench (harper collins). baum's children's books also inspired the 1939 mgm film, the wizard of oz that launched the literary and movie tradition of the "wizard" and his "wizardry." the author and several film as art: beyond the frame, edited by robert s. thomson and david bordwell (university of california press). film studies students have long been taught that films tell stories. this collection of essays by some of the most distinguished film scholars working today, however, asks how to extend the richness of the works of art to extend the categories that we use to understand them, and the modes of perception and evaluation that underlie them. crossing the boundaries between film history and visual studies, documentary and experimental, and even narrative and avant-garde, the contributors examine film at times literally and figuratively beyond the frame.

filmmaking: techniques and values in early american cinema, by gary reams (university of illinois press). here, for the first time, a leading authority in the field brings together some of the finest writers who have addressed the films of the early years to examine their content and to compare and contrast this content with what came later. from a study of motion pictures at the turn of the century to an examination of the silent drama, from the earliest color shorts to the repertory companies of the 1920s, this collection of 13 essays offers an up-to-date survey of the history of early american cinema.

cinema and social problems: 100 years of theory, edited by paul arthur (university of california press). this volume explores the critical history of cinema in the last 100 years and interrogates its relation to society. taken together, the essays address the critical theory of the birth of modern film studies, the relationships between cinema and cultural and social subjects including the family and sexuality, the mass media, and race. together, the 100 chapters cover everything from the significance of censorship to the indelible imprint of hollywood and even the impact of Broadway and other cultural influences on cinema history. the table of contents of this book sums up the essays as a review of the field: how film-making takes place, how it is understood by certain groups, how it affects our lives, and how critics explain that.
