The factory is essentially this: public class FactoryTest { public static ISomething CreateObject(object request) { return (ISomething) Activator.CreateInstance(request); } } Which I use like this: object result = FactoryTest.CreateObject(new object()); The problem I have is that I have an object in my application that I need to change out, so the above way of creating the object is not good enough. The object is basically a representation of the database which, I believe, inherits an interface ISomething. The class that needs to be changed is a db-backed object and this part of the application is the one that is clearly out of my control (I do not have access to it). Is there any way that I can cast an existing ISomething object to a different ISomething object and change the properties of that type? A: Not sure of what you're trying to do. If the object that you want to change is a db-backed object why not just change the database that the object references? That would be the only way I see of changing this object. (CNN) -- The Federal Emergency Management Agency has activated its National Response Framework, which means U.S. troops can be called to help if necessary. The National Response Framework was activated this morning, said FEMA spokesman Robert

Repetski. FEMA had never activated that scenario before, he said. Repetski said there is a gap between declaring a major disaster and activating FEMA's National Response Framework, but that the two are linked. Last month, F.E.M.A. declared six states and Washington, D.C., in a major disaster because of the threat of flooding and mudslides. Twenty-eight homes were destroyed by the floods, and many others sustained minor damage or were uninhabitable, officials said.Evaluation of the NASA Pocket Mine in the Particulate and Gas Yield Testing of 79a2804d6b
