I'm using a ZyXEL GS109TU-6HN-C 4 port gigabit router as my internal DHCP-server, and it was working well. I used a free cable modem from Cox, connected it to a DWL-G132 wireless adapter, and connected that to my web browser. I could connect to www.google.com just fine. Now I have a TimeWarner cable modem connected to a R7000 12 port gigabit router. I connected the cable modem to the DSL port of the R7000 and entered 192.168.1.1 into the web browser. I got a "could not reach..." error and in the status bar it said "No DHCP OFFERS received." I then changed the DHCP server setting from 192.168.1.1 to 192.168.1.100 (the IP of my first router), and I could connect fine. Why did I lose my connection from the first router? Is there any way to get it back? If not, why didn't the second router return the request for a DHCP address? The router's manual says that "v3.0.01.04 PSM (Chrome) Service Release 24.0.1312.52 (Macintosh)" is "a release of the PSM application that adds improved support for DSM-2 configuration and configuration administration." DSM-2 is a Cisco networking protocol, so I am assuming I have some new config somewhere that must be updated to work with the new router. When I go to 192.168.1.1 it takes me to the IP configuration utility. I cannot figure out how to update
