After I wrote about the nefarious marketing scheme between China's Huawei and Saudi Arabia and Theresa May's desire to stem the flow of Chinese exports to the kingdom, if you thought the Saudis had been bad enough to Brexit voters it turns out we haven't seen anything yet. The UK's biggest mobile carrier, EE, is now lending technical support to the Saudi crown prince's plan to build the world's most advanced AI system. EE's technical support will allow the Saudi Crown Prince Mohammed bin Salman to develop a better-than-human artificial intelligence and achieve his goal of developing an AI system that can advance the kingdom's core industries, including construction and electricity, towards better overall results. In response to the Saudi's request for a qualified telecommunications service provider in the kingdom, EE has placed an order for the network technology needed to launch the Saudi's $2bn AI project, which will support a range of SA's key industries including agriculture, logistics, healthcare, transportation, banking, and government services. Though no director of the agency says any direct money has exchanged hands between the UK and Saudi governments, it's reasonable to assume that the government of the UK is directly benefitting the Saudi government, and as a UK company, a large part of that is the greater access to and influence with UK customers. As CNBC explains: In 2017, Saudi oil production hit its highest-ever levels, but the country has been beset by high unemployment and a lack of housing, driving the rise of populist movements. In one of the most hotly contested races in the country's history, Prince Mohammed bin Salman's half-brother is running as the candidate to succeed his older brother as crown prince and CEO of Saudi Aramco. While of course every bit of technology can be used for good, it's also quite true that no technology is an exact substitute for human intelligence, which is precisely why the rest of the world has been fighting against China's efforts to develop their own version of
